

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Dr. Barbara J. Moore, CCC-SLP, is the director of special services for the East Side Union School District in San Jose, California. An American Speech–Language–Hearing Association (ASHA) board-certified specialist in child language, she has served in several leadership roles in professional associations, including treasurer for the American Board of Child Language and Language Disorders (2016–2017), ASHA vice president of planning (2011–2013), president of the California Speech–Language–Hearing Association (1997–1999), and president of the Council of State Speech–Language–Hearing Association Presidents (2000–2001). She lectures widely on issues related to special education, response to intervention, and school-based speech–language services. Dr. Moore holds a bachelor’s degree in communicative disorders and linguistics from California State University, Fullerton; a master’s degree in communication disorders from Whittier College; and a doctorate in education leadership from the University of Southern California.

Judy K. Montgomery, PhD, CCC-SLP, is a professor of communicative sciences and disorders at Chapman University in Irvine, California, and a board-certified specialist in child language, with 24 years of experience in the public schools as a speech–language pathologist, K–8 principal, and director of special education. She is the executive director of the Childhood Language Center in Santa Ana, California, and the former president of ASHA, the California Speech–Language–Hearing Association, and the U.S. Society for Augmentative and Alternative Communication. Her research interests include evidence-based practice, vocabulary interventions, and collaborative service delivery models. She enjoys sharing knowledge with fellow professionals and has written numerous books, has authored a standardized test (Montgomery Assessment of Vocabulary Acquisition), and is the editor of Communication Disorders Quarterly.
